Cocaine abuse has reached epidemic proportions in the United States and the world. The understanding of the involvement of dopamine in the reinforcing effects of cocaine has been hindered by the inability to distinguish between those presynaptic dopamine neurons that secrete dopamine versus those that regulate the inhibition of dopamine transmission. Recently, a novel class of anti-D2 dopamine receptor ligands, the D2 agonists, have become available that are selective for D2 receptors without activating D1 receptors. The availability of these agents has permitted characterization of dopaminergic control of opiate, but not cocaine reward. The specific overall goal of this proposal is to assess the contribution of specific D2 receptor subtypes in modulating the reinforcing effects of cocaine. It is further hoped that these studies will provide a basis for the development of novel therapeutic approaches to cocaine addiction. The central hypothesis of this proposal is that the D2 agonists will decrease the reinforcing effects of cocaine, and that these effects will be mediated by their actions on specific D2 receptor subtypes. To test this hypothesis, Dr. Perez will examine the effects of systemically injected D2 agonists on cocaine self-administration and dopamine secretion in the ventral midbrain of wild-type and KO mice. These studies will examine the role of specific D2 receptor subtypes in mediating the reinforcing properties of cocaine.
